Having seen several ptarmigan during family hikes in recent years, Schaefermeyer said she was inspired to include the Alaska state bird as a fitting addition to a painting featuring an Alaska icon, the Alaska Railroad.

Expecting her fifth child in October, the artist was further inspired to surround a male and female ptarmigan with five chicks. "Alaska summers are often a time when family comes to visit, gathering together to enjoy each other and beautiful nature," she said. That beauty includes Alaska's classic wildflowers — forget-me-nots, fireweed, lupine — also featured in the painting.

She said the painting also reflects her joy over being chosen to create the artwork. "I feel as though the baby I carry brings another blessing — a chance to work with the railroad. This is my honor," she said. The happy news took her mind off some of COVID-19's grim impacts. Three years ago, this self-taught artist established a downtown art shop and gallery, Dreaming Bear Studio — <https://www.dreamingbearstudio.com/>. Like so many businesses that rely on tourism, her gallery was hit hard by the pandemic. Yet, she remains grateful to customers who have come back to support her during this difficult time.

Schaefermeyer originally hails from South Korea, where she met her husband Karl. In 2006, Karl brought Kwangsook to Alaska to settle in his hometown of Seward.

The railroad's annual art print program began 43 years ago, when ARRC commissioned renowned artist John Van Zyle to produce an official painting. Since that 1979 beginning, the annual tradition (except in 1984, when no painting was released) has evolved into a popular collector's item.
